About hydraulic jumps. The depth of supercritical flow,  $y_1$ , jumps up to its subcritical conjugate depth,  $y_2$ , and the result of this abrupt change in flow conditions is considerable turbulence and Energy Loss,  $E_L$ . Figure 1 shows a schematic of typical jump characteristics where  $E_1$  is the energy of the upstream flow,  $E_2$  is the energy ...

Design guidelines for these spillways are limited. However, research attempts to assist engineers. The two main design components are the inception point (where flow bulking first occurs "increased flow depth) and the energy dissipation that occurs.

Design Criteria Considerations. Chemical treatment usually requires storage or flow control measuring equipment upstream of chemical treatment site (e.g., flow restricting valves, tank, water retention basin) in order to provide a controlled flow rate for effective chemical dosing.
